Selection Criteria

- Evidence of deeply engaged, high-quality academic work: Demonstrated integration of civic and community engagement in one's teaching, and possibly in one's research and/or service, as appropriate to one's context and roles (Some form of curricular engagement—e.g., teaching undergraduate or graduate service-learning courses, developing departmental or institutional civic engagement programs and curricula, studying the impact of such courses and programs on students' civic development—is required of all candidates; other forms of civic engagement, such as conducting community-based participatory research, are optional.)
- Evidence of community collaboration and change: Demonstrated commitment and capacity to develop and sustain reciprocal community partnerships and to contribute to positive change on issues of public concern (Examples include ongoing work with community members to design, implement, and improve engagement initiatives, recognition of partners as co-educators, evaluation results that show benefits for communities as well as students, support for multi-faceted partnerships focused on particular public issues.)
- Evidence of institutional impact: Demonstrated leadership in developing cultures, programs, and/or policies that promote meaningful engagement on one's campus, within higher education, or in one's discipline (This may happen through, for example, efforts aimed at redesigning curriculum, enhancing faculty development, recognizing engagement in faculty hiring, tenure, and promotion, or fostering common vision and collaboration across units or institutions.)
